The second project discussed Wednesday involved providing a restaurant-quality concession at home basketball games, one providing food so good that even people not interested in the games would drive over to buy take-out. The project would be self-sustaining with students handling all aspects of the business. Ideally, they'll make enough to earn a wage, as well. Presently the concessions are mostly the work of parent volunteers who also provide most of the food and supplies.

In addition to Newkirk, Bosarge and Martin, other participants included BIC director Sunny Hill, science teacher Heidi Karr, Rural Revitalization Initiative member Kelly Hill, arts director Christina Boyce, Capulin citizen Janice Morrow and students Ismael Escobar and Ashlee Salas.

Tim Keller, published author, professional author, photographer, and teacher at Raton High School, was the guest speaker at Columbian Elementary School's Writer's Tea last Thursday.

The Writer's Tea, organized by Columbian educators, Wanda Henson, Christi Medina, and Superintendent Pam Hunnicut, is a time for students to share their writing with other students, family members and staff, learn more about opportunities in writing, and to visit with members of the community who use writing in their work.

Keller, who has been published in Western Horseman, a national magazine, and The Chronicle-News, explained to the audience that his recent success in becoming published as an author happened because of his budding interest in photography, and his love of the scenery and people of New Mexico. As he took hundreds of photos that told the stories, he found that the text played an important part in giving background and explanation for the photos. Now he enjoys writing the stories as much as telling the story through his photos, especially when one can get paid for it.

"You write, you send it in, and they send you money. It's a pretty good deal."

He encouraged the students of the best ways to learn to write.

"The way I learned how to write was mostly from reading," Keller stated. "I read a lot of newspapers and magazines. So I see how things should be written."

At the Writer's Tea, Keller introduced one of his students, Liz Strnad, as a guest. Strnad has a sincere interest in writing and spoke to the children at the Writer's Tea. When she asked the students what they enjoyed writing about, several students volunteered that they liked to write about their families, about snakes, or about their pets. Strnad said that the really great thing about writing is that they could write about anything.

The Columbian Elementary newsletter, "Columbian Writes," is published about seven times throughout the school year and showcases the student's writing. Superintendent Hunnicut explained that they make sure that every student has at least one entry in the newsletter.

A faux ice storm hits residence in Raton

The Chronicle-News

When Phillip Fresquez arrived at his home at 871 N. Second St. on Thursday morning, he thought that a freak weather phenomenon had occurred when he saw icicles covering his tree and bushes in his front yard. But, instead, found that his sons, who had been watering the grass the day before had left the sprinkler on overnight. With the freezing temperatures that evening, the water froze, creating the look of an ice storm. Even with the warmer temperatures, he expects it will take a little time for the ice to melt.
