

Coalitions join forces to promote community awareness, prevent teen suicide

Coalition members also discussed another current priority of making the community more aware of the seriousness of families hosting underage drinking parties in their homes. Debbie Shronce, Tobacco Education Prevention Program Coordinator for the Las Animas and Huerfano Counties District Health Department, said recent studies have shown that close to 60 percent of underage drinking is being done at somebody's house. She said more community education is needed to remove the perception that adults hosting drinking parties for their kids and their friends are considered the social norm in today's society.

Shronce also reported that the final state tobacco prevention program budgets recently handed down had only minimal local effect due to Las Animas County's high tobacco use prevalence rate, as well as its current high and low socio-economic rates.

Shronce also gave a power point presentation on policy work, why state and federal grants are moving toward this as a best practice, and how established policy can enhance a community.

Her presentation specifically focused on the Chicago-based Midwest Academy, a national training institute committed to advancing the struggle for social, economic and racial justice. From local neighborhood groups to statewide and national organizations, Shronce noted that Midwest Academy has trained more than 25,000 grassroots activists from hundreds of organizations and coalitions by teaching an organizing philosophy, methods and skills that enable ordinary people to actively participate in the democratic process.

Her power points included information on organizing, building and joining coalitions and their advantages and disadvantages, principles for effective and successful coalitions, questions to consider before joining a coalition and developing leadership skills in coalitions.

Shronce also recently sent letters to the editor of local media outlets reminding parents and their children of Colorado's Tobacco Free School Law that prohibits the use of tobacco products on and around any school property.

"I would hope that as a community we can provide the example necessary for the health of our children and refrain from using tobacco products for a few hours of our children's lives during the participation in sporting events and encourage non-smokers to voice their knowledge of the law in requesting that tobacco users on school property please abstain from the use of tobacco products," she said in the letter.

September Sizzle sparkles at Mandala Center

The Mandala Center presented its fall concert to a full house at the center west of Des Moines Saturday night. Raton's Randi Whitman joined her Denver friends Valerie Powell and Eileen Terry in presenting the trio's sixth Mandala Center concert to an appreciative audience.

The performance was sandwiched between other events in a busy weekend called the Volcano Triangle Fall Festival, including Saturday's Des Moines Street Fair and Folsom's spaghetti feed as well as Sunday's Capulin Volcano Run. Many who spent the day at Saturday's street fair were later seen - in spiffier clothes - at The Mandala Center.

"September Sizzle: An Evening Concert" presented two sets of music encompassing a wide variety of sources and styles. Terry's versatile piano skills anchored the concert as she accompanied flute melodies performed by Whitman and several songs sung by soprano Powell.

Powell brought an actor's skills to her animated performances, even donning a black shawl to feign the cold inhabiting one song, and her knowing smile was infectious. The audience repeatedly gave her generous ovations.

Technical problems at The Mandala

Center caused the concert to be presented in candlelight with small musician's lamps. Although new executive director Lori Coon apologized, many felt that the lighting provided a welcome intimacy that accentuated the lush virtuosity of the music. An audience of four-dozen people watched and listened from vantages in four rooms radiating out from the Steinway & Sons baby grand piano near the Mandala Center's fountain.

For Coon, it was the first formal event at the center since arriving a week earlier from Jamestown, New York. Many Mandala Center regulars welcomed her during the wine-and-cheese reception held during intermission and lingering for an hour after the concert's end. Her predecessor, Gaye Brown, retired recently after spending nine years creating Mandala Center programs. Coon seemed to relish the task ahead, with the September Sizzle concert a popular success and great beginning.

Dad convicted of child abuse in missing girl case

Dad convicted of child abuse in missing girl case

CENTENNIAL, Colo. (AP) - Jurors on Monday found a father guilty of fatal child abuse, among several other charges, in the disappearance and presumed death of his young daughter.

The abuse charge was the most serious of 57 that Aaron Thompson, of Aurora, faced in the 2005 disappearance of his daughter Aarone. Jurors convicted Thompson of 31 of the charges after nine days of deliberation and a six-week trial.

Thompson, who showed no emotion when the verdicts were read, also was convicted of conspiracy to knowingly commit fatal child abuse. He faces up to 80 years in prison for the two child abuse convictions alone.

Thompson also was found guilty of false reporting to authorities, concealing a death and conspiracy to conceal a death.

The charges he was acquitted of included second-degree assault and second-degree assault involving a deadly weapon.

He will be sentenced Nov. 10. Thompson reported his daughter missing in November 2005, when she would have been 6. He said she ran away after an argument.

Authorities believed she may have died about two years earlier. Her body has not been found.

Prosecutor Robert Chappell said he was satisfied the jury convicted Thompson on the most serious charges.

"It's one step closer to justice for Aarone," Chappell said to the media after the verdict was read. "I think if you were to ask that question to police, I think they would say justice will be the day that they find her body." Chappell said it was a tough case for police because they initially believed it was possible to find and save the girl.

Thompson's attorneys left the courtroom without commenting.

Defense attorneys acknowledged on the trial's first day that Aarone was already dead when her father reported her missing, but that he was not responsible for her death. Thompson's defense sought to blame his live-in girlfriend, Shely Lowe, for Aarone's death, saying that Thompson's story that his daughter ran away because of an argument over a cookie was a desperate attempt to cover for Lowe.

She died in 2006 from heart problems.

Lowe told a friend in a secretly taped conversation played in court that Aarone died in her sleep. Authorities have never made clear how Aarone died.

But prosecutors described a grim picture of the Thompson house to jurors, telling them that the seven children living in the home were repeatedly beaten with belts, television cords and a baseball bat by Thompson, who his children called "Big A."

In closing arguments, prosecutors said the house was a "torture chamber" and urged jurors to "do justice."

Children in the home told police that Aarone got the brunt of the punishment, and was often locked in a closet for hours for wetting her bed.

After Thompson reported his daughter missing, a massive search ensued in Aurora. But investigators soon became suspicious of the family, noting that they couldn't provide recent photographs of the girl.

Thompson was arrested in May 2007 after a grand jury indictment.

A mistrial was declared on two of the 57 charges. Defense and prosecuting attorneys agreed to the declaration of a mistrial on counts of conspiracy to abuse a corpse and abuse of a corpse after the jurors failed to reach a consensus.
