CITY COUNCIL

Limits on Marijuana business locations passes

Steve Block
The Chronicle-News

Trinidad's City Council passed a resolution limiting the number of medical and retail marijuana business locations that could legally operate within city limits. By a five to two vote, after a public hearing, council approved limiting the number of marijuana businesses to a total of 20 locations within the city, with Councilmembers Pat Fletcher and Carlos Lopez dissenting.

The new rules don't apply to any medical or retail marijuana business location that's already been approved by the city council, or any such business that's started the licensing process by May 1, 2016. The rules also wouldn't apply to license renewals for such businesses. The numerical limitation on locations will only apply to medical marijuana centers and

"He solves my problems," says Lauren with a smile across the table. "A role I enjoy," continues Brien with a laugh. "Lauren and I are a great team that way."

"I create problems and he solves them," answers a kidding Lauren. Brien tries to explain. "For me it's about trying to solve for the things that allow her to do what she does even more efficiently. That's what it's about... Taking something that is handcrafted and very meticulously created and trying to grow that to scale, that's a fun interplay I get to have with her. How can I solve this problem?"

The pair is now featured players in Trinidad's burgeoning cannabis industry. Beyond creating an intoxicating product, they're trying to elevate what new consumers expect from marijuana edibles. Galaxies can be glimpsed in the abstract swirls and splatters of

Alamosa: Going to the beautiful center of southern Colorado

A magical journey across an enchanting land

Rising to an alarm long before dawn is a hard way to start a journey, but when I later spot the sun emerging through riverside trees and adjacent railroad trestle just as I cross the Conejos River, I know life is right, and early rising usually pays.

Taking advantage of the Comfort Inn's Express Checkout (I'd said, "What did you call it, Fresh Checkout?"), I left Alamosa at first dawn on Monday morning. Antonito, like many of the small towns and villages ringing the San Luis Valley, is a 30-minute drive from Alamosa, the valley's market center and only city.

Even that early, a steady stream of

COLORADO TRAVELOGUE

Alamosa: Going to the beautiful center of southern Colorado

A magical journey across an enchanting land

headlights passed me as people drove from farms and villages to begin their workweeks in Alamosa. Only my headlights were driving away, south toward Antonito across beautiful irrigated farmlands running up to the foot of the San Juan Mountains.

Wherever it's not been broken by the plow, the 8000 square miles of the San Luis Valley demonstrate that this is high desert. Yet the Conejos River is wide and full, rich life-giving took pride in telling me, "Fifteen years ago, I used to run this place. I was a chef." Seated next to the woodstove, he told me that it was made—welded together—right there.

I asked him about the large color landscape photographs lining the café's walls. "Those were all taken around here by Mike Rael, Jr.," he said. "He teaches up at Adams State in Alamosa." Then Robert told me that I had to go see Colorado's oldest church, just a couple miles away in the tiny village of Conejos. Robert lives in a smaller settlement down a dirt road just west of Conejos.

Our Lady of Guadalupe Catholic Church was indeed glorious catching the full morning sun. A bronze plaque told its history. Built in 1858, Bishop John Lamy came all the way from Santa Fe to dedicate the new church. Today it has two impressive brick towers just as Lamy had designed for his own church. Lamy never got his, though: When he died before his church's completion, the workers left without completing the job, a story told in Willa Cather's novel, "Death Comes for the Archbishop." Today, a block from the Santa Fe Plaza, the St. Francis Cathedral still stands without its intended towers.

The church in Conejos burned down in 1926 and was water flowing down from the San Juans in time to irrigate a new year's crops. From here to the village of San Luis, 40 miles east, I'll pass three more rivers—the San Antonio, the Rio Grande and the Culebra. Below the land's surface, shallow warm-water aquifers underlie the valley so center-pivot irrigation catches the traveler's eye more often than do the acequias—irrigation ditches—that make arteries better visible from above.

As a New Mexican, I've long known of Antonito as the northern terminal of the Cumbres & Toltec Scenic Railroad that has run since 1880 along narrow-gauge tracks over mountain passes to Chama, NM. Among the shiny red railroad cars dry-docked for the winter, I could hear men's voices from a large adjacent shop where they were preparing for next month's opening of their season. Next to the depot was a marijuana store, one of two I saw in the village of 775 people. (I'd find two more ahead in slightly smaller San Luis.)

As the sun reached its neon sign, I photographed the outside of the Dutch Mill Café & Bar, then saw a red notice in the window that said "Open." Two hours of coffee drinking made me happy for a pit stop. Inside the café a waitress was readying tables for breakfast. The restrooms were through the adjacent bar to the back, past a massive woodstove beside a huge bin half-filled with tree stumps and large logs.

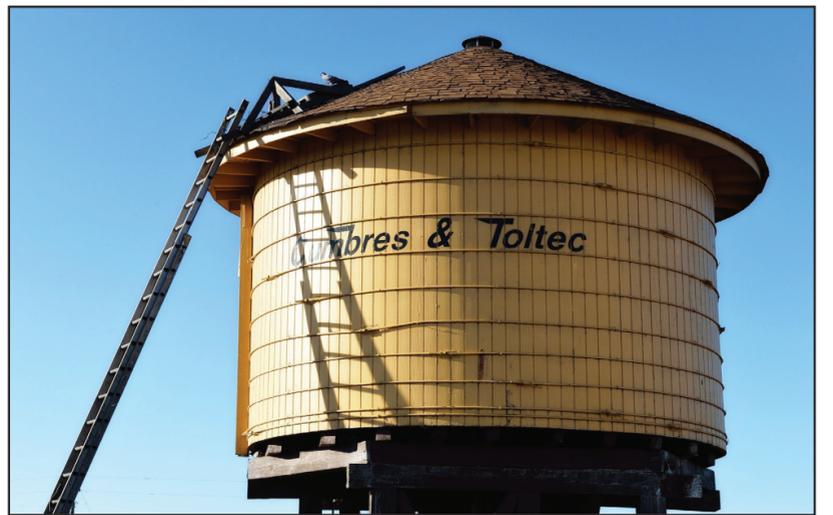

Thirty feet from each other, two men sat silently in the bar as the sun threw its light the length of the long room. One man watched TV at the bar. The other, Robert Armenta, sat at a table facing the light, his hands wrapped around a hot mug of coffee. Now disabled, he rebuilt in 1927. I found it closed and locked. Robert explained that it's temporarily closed due to interior damage from an electrical fire earlier this year.

The small San Luis Valley town of Manassa, above, was the birthplace and home to Jack Dempsey who gained the nickname "Manassa Mauler" when he won boxing's heavyweight world championship in 1924. His birthplace is now a museum. Los Caminos Antiguos is a Colorado Scenic Byway, below, making a 128-mile semi-circle around the San Luis Valley. The valley is picturesque from any vantage, but Los Caminos Antiguos takes in many of valley's highlights.

Driving east on Highway 142, part of the Los Caminos Antiguos Scenic Byway, a 128-mile semi-circle around the San Luis Valley, I passed the tiny village of Romeo and reached Manassa, a well-maintained town best known as the birthplace of Jack Dempsey, the Manassa Mauler, heavyweight boxing champion of the world in 1924. His childhood home is now a museum amid the town's park.

From Manassa 24 miles to San Acacio, past the San Antonio and Rio Grande rivers, public lands dominate and fences are few. Dramatic rock outcroppings caught my eye. Then, just below them, I spotted a herd of 15 horses. A mile farther on, I turned back for the chance that these were, in fact, the first wild horses I've ever seen. With a long lens and a short hike, I was able to photograph them as they watched my approach.

In San Luis, I learned that there are two herds of wild horses in the area. Some residents have never had the good fortune to spot them. Others have seen them crossing Highway 142.

Founded in 1851, San Luis is Colorado's oldest town and home to the state's oldest business still open—R&R Market, established in 1857—and the state's oldest acequia, the San Luis Peoples Ditch, dug by the valley's original settlers and established by court decree on April 10, 1852. They created irrigation before they created a store or a church.

I stepped into the village hall to learn from town clerk Mary Jo Manzanares that the town's population is 629 "right now." We laughed about how in such small towns, the population dips whenever someone drives to the city for supplies. I'd been wondering which pronunciation people use for San Luis. "We say San Luis, the Spanish way," Mary Jo said, although she allowed that in some parts of the valley, "some people may say San Luis."

She pointed me to the high hill across the street where the town's iconic attraction, the Stations of the Cross Shrine, arrays fifteen bronze sculptures, near life-size, depicting the final days of Jesus Christ from capture to crucifixion to resurrection. Sculptor Huberto Maestas installed his work 25 years ago along a climbing path that winds nearly a mile to the top. I saw locals and tourists alike at the top.

I love small towns and San Luis is beauty. I finished my stay by walking the length of the town, photographing its impressive murals and enjoying the sunny day. Old guys drove by in old pickups, looking like they'd bought their trucks fifty years ago and kept them. I enjoyed thoughts of myself living here, an attractive notion.

And then I moved on.

Next Friday: Look for the Great Sand Dunes National Park & Preserve. Still to come: Fort Garland and Colorado Gators!

Colorado's oldest church, Our Lady of Guadalupe was established in 1858 in Conejos, just north of Antonito, dedicated by Bishop Lamy of Santa Fe. Destroyed by fire in 1926, it was rebuilt in 1927. An electrical fire three months ago has again temporarily closed the church.

Local sculptor Huberto Maestas created San Luis's iconic Stations of the Cross Shrine 25 years ago. The town's Knights of Columbus chapter later built partially paved paths winding up the hill beside town. Fifteen sculptures depict the story of Christ's capture, crucifixion and resurrection.
